It comes as a surprise to many that the grass beneath our feet is the UK's biggest crop. The temperate climate, both warm and wet relative to other parts of the world, makes it the ideal environment for growing the green stuff, and especially so in the mild south west. It's a fantastic free crop that is the keystone of sustainable, regenerative farming when managed sensitively, reducing reliance on environmentally damaging artificial fertilisers, and providing livestock with crucial nutrients through a natural diet.
